

Crescence Okah holds a Postgraduate degree (DEA) on Private Law and Criminal Sciences and a Master II Degree in banking management (option: financial jurist) at University of Yaounde II, in Cameroon. She is currently PHD student in Business criminal law at University of Lorraine (France). Her thesis entitled “Opportunity of a criminal liability of Cameroonian banks regarding money laundering caused by the breach of their anti-money laundering obligations”. The aim of her thesis is to show that there are several arguments which base the criminal liability of Cameroonian Banks, when they fail to honour their anti-money laundering requirements.

After completing her two Master II Degree, she has taught Banking law in a private University of Cameroon, namely, the “Higher Institute of Advanced Technology and Management”. She is a member of Institute François Geny, based in Nancy (France). She is also a member of International Association of Francophone researchers in microfinance.

Crescence is author of several publications, such as the book entitled: “Sanction pénale et règlementation bancaire : cas de la Zone CEMAC” (Criminal sanction and banking regulations: the case of EMCCA Zone), Editions universitaires européennes, August 2012.

Furthermore, Crescence is really interested by the human right, especially the protection of human right. In this context, she worked for two years in a young persons' rehabilitation school, based in Cameroon. During this experience, she looked after children with problems at school to improve their skills.
